That is the only thing about Plato's theory is that it does not prepare you for all the bad things that happen. It is like the saying goes you must take the bad with the good, and that is what you get when you experience life because nothing in life is fair. People can only show or teach you so much before you just have to have experience to learn more.

It contends the notion that nirvana was the main goal sought by Buddhists, and values that make it impossible for us to have a utopian world. People in different countries and even in the same countries, don't have the same definition when it comes to equality. We, as people must share the views and think exactly alike in order to have a utopian world. For instance, if we all thought the same way and agreed on everything, would the world still be perfect? Without having any type of voting, having the same routine day in and day out would eventually get boring. So if we see someone or something as boring, do we characterize it or there as being "bored?"

Countries are also ruled differently. Some countries may have an oligarchy, ruled by few, or a democracy, ruled by many (Aristotle, 115). If the whole world were ruled by the same person then maybe we would have a chance to become a utopian world. Even if the whole world was a democracy but ruled by different people, the world still wouldn't be equal. People have their own opinions and their own perceptions on what's wrong and right or equal or not equal. Everyone has the "best" idea on how the world should be run. As Aristotle says, "But there still remains a question: equality or inequality of what?" (Aristotle, 123)

On a more personal outlook, I feel that the world can't be utopian. In general, some people just work much more harder than others and deserve to be rewarded for it. Some people spend their lifetime trying to better themselves, through education and other
